

Montreal, Canada – September 21, 2005 – Today DTI Software, the market leader in In-Flight Entertainment (IFE) Software announced another first for In-flight Entertainment with the launch of Relaxline™ at WAEA 2005. This new product will address one of the needs found amongst a percentage of air travelers by serving as a tool to help reduce stress or anxiety caused by the fear of flying.

Relaxline™ is a versatile software application that guides the user through relaxation sessions that can be customized to meet user's specific needs. Behind the development of this software stood a team of psychiatrists, psychologists and stress management consultants to design and insure the quality of each of the interactive relaxation sessions.

With flight in mind, Relaxline™ provides helpful information to help passengers have more enjoyable and positive flying experience. For those out of touch with their own stress level, there is a useful diagnosis tool to help the user get started on their journey to piece of mind. For more advanced users, fully customizable relaxation sessions are available or they may opt for the standard nine steps to complete relaxation.

"We are delighted to partner with DTI Software to bring interactive personalized relaxation into airplanes", said Serge Limousin, CEO of Relaxline. "There is no place on earth where people need to relax more than in an airplane. With our software on board, people can relax and meditate alone, exactly as they want and need to, without moving from their seat, making their flight a more serene, restful experience."
